PARIS, Oct. 22 [United Press].—The allies are rolling back the German line. They have pushed a wedge through the invading forces thirteen miles north of Lille and for the first time since the series of battles in the north commenced they have pushed their forces east of Lille.

In a distance of only forty-five miles three separate battles of extreme violence are in progress. From Nieuport. ten miles southeast to Dixmude, the Belgian army, reinforced by the naval brigade and covered by the guns of the British war fleet, are rolling the Germans back. The Germans have left 10,000 dead and wounded on the field here.

From Dixmude, twelve miles south to Ypres, there is no fighting. The Germans and allies maintain a line there, but it has not been marked with any general encounter since Beginning at Ypres and extending nine and one-half miles southeast to Menin there is a second battle. The Germans were forced back nearly three miles last night.

The Germans had mounted searchlights to command the territory, and after shelling the allied position they assaulted in force. The French forces had a score of masked batteries in waiting.

The Germans were literally cut to pieces by the fire of the French three-inch guns and the rapid firers.

The battle lasted several hours, and the German line was forced back. Their first line of trenches was occupied by the allies.

German Invasion of England LONDON, Oct. 22 [United Press]. Once again the Belgians have interfered with the plans of the German General Staff, and it is now believed by military critics that the chance for German invasion of England has been lost.

The general reports here were that Germany, in moving to take Dunkirk, intended to start an invading force from there and Ostend.

It is believed an aerial raid was intended to terrorize London. Then the German fleet was to go out and give battle to the British war fleet while an invading force was rushed across the Channel.

But the Belgians who avoided being cut off on their retreat from Antwerp developed such an effective offensive high rank from Nieuport to Dixmude that the dash of the Germans toward Dunkirk has failed.

Supported by the great guns of the British fleet, the Belgians have rolled the German offensive back, and all reports front, west of Warsaw. It is also received here to-day say the Germans are at last on the
